Liquid Hydrogen Hailed as New Space Age Fuel

Liquid hydrogen of the type to be produced at a new plant here may take some of the spotlight away from boron as a rocket fuel, according to statements made by a leading scientist in the Wall Street Journal this week.

Dr. Werner von Braun, head of development operations for the Army's Ballistic Missile Agency, said liquid hydrogen gives about 40 per cent more thrust than jet fuels and 15 per cent more than boron. Because liquid hydrogen is so cold (minus 423 degrees Fahrenheit), it will not replace boron as first choice for high energy fuel for aircraft, the scientist emphasized. Boron gives aircraft as much as 30 per cent more range than regular fuels, he said.

Present Speech Drama

Spacemen and grammar combined furnished an assembly program for Riviera Elementary School students Thursday as members of Miss Betty Wingham's fifth grade class at Parkway School journeyed to present a play.

The liquid hydrogen fuel will be the only fuel outside of conventional fuels that will be used for "specialty space shots," von Braun said.

Production of the exotic fuel is scheduled to get under way here next year in a new plant to be built on the Union Carbide property at Hawthorne Ave. and Del Amo Blvd.
